

Australasian Parliamentary Review

Interested in submitting to the APR?

The APR is a journal of issues affecting the operation of Parliaments in Australia, New Zealand and the South Pacific. APR is published twice a year and is committed to encouraging and stimulating research, writing and teaching about the parliamentary institutions of the region. APR also publishes material on issues relating to parliament, whether arising from policy debates, major committee reports, political and electoral matters, referenda or significant court decisions. Where relevant to the Australasian experience, the Editor also welcomes manuscripts relating to international events.

All material submitted is internally refereed by Members of the APR Editorial Board using the single or double blind review process. The Editorial Board comprises academics and practitioners qualified to provide constructive evaluation of the value of the submission for publication in the journal. The Editor is also a member of the Editorial Board and reserves the right to accept or decline submissions.

Double blind review submissions will be subject to more judicious assessment in terms of observing high academic standards of originality, insight, clarity and rigour and, if accepted for publication, will be noted as such in the journal. Authors may request a double blind review, however, in so doing should be aware of these requirements.

Material submitted to the APR may be considered more suited to publication on the website of the ASPG as Occasional Papers – see www.aspg.org.au.

Contributions will ONLY be accepted in electronic form to the Editor jennifer@aldred.com.au and should include a 100–200 word abstract stating what the article has to offer the reader. Full contact (email address essential) and institutional affiliation de-tails of the author(s) should also be supplied on submission and kept current prior to publication.

In submitting the manuscript, the author(s) warrants that:

- The article is an original work written by the author(s) whose name appears of the manuscript;
- The article has not been previously published elsewhere unless otherwise agreed to by the journal editor;

- The author(s) has the full power and authority to grant that right.

Articles should be between 4000–6000 words in length. In exceptional cases, articles of up to 10,000 words will be considered. Shorter pieces, particularly those dealing with current research projects or findings are invited.

As the APR encourages a lively and constructive exchange of views, readers' commentaries on published work are actively encouraged as a short article of 800–1000 words or in the form of a Letter to the Editor of not more than 400 words in length.

Review articles dealing with a significant book or set of books on emerging themes in the areas of interest to the APR readership are welcomed.

Allow at least three months for review and consideration of submissions to be completed. Pre-publication proof copies of articles are NOT made available to authors.

COPYRIGHT: By submitting the manuscript to the Editor of the APR, the author(s) – or other copyright owner – agrees that it may be published in the journal and therefore sold or distributed within the journal, on its own, or with other related material. Moral rights and copyright of the original manuscript belong to the author(s). As such the author(s) have the right to republish the article after first publication in the journal subject to full bibliographic citation of the original publication in the APR.
